FARMER WHO SHOT NEIGHBOR LIKELY TO GET LIFE TERM

HIS FRIENDS TESTIFY

Twelve Year Fight Over The Water Rights Was Cause Of the Murder

DOYLESTOWN, Sept. 12—It is not likely that 55-year-old Alex Legat, Springfield township farmer, will go to the electric chair for the murder of his neighbor, Paul Kulscar, 60, on the night of June 21, to which charge he has pleaded guilty in the Bucks County Court before President Judge Hiram H. Keller and Judge Calvin S. Boyer.

The Hungarian farmer may spend the rest of his life in jail or he may get ten to twenty years. He pleaded guilty to a charge of murder which in law means second degree murder. The Court, however, can still change the decree, if they see fit, after hearing the testimony, and if they decide upon first degree murder, it is then up to the Court to fix the penalty, of either life imprisonment or the death penalty. In the case of second degree murder the Court will pronounce sentence according to law.

Friends of Legat testified in court yesterday afternoon before adjournment that Legat had told them that a twelve-year feud with Kulscar over the ownership of water rights on their Springfield township properties, had preyed on his mind to such an extent that he did not know what to do.

Both Legat and Kulscar had been in court and before the minor judiciary a number of times because they quarrelled over the water rights. Legat claimed that Kulscar used up his source of water supply and that at times Legat's children were without water.

On the night of June 21, Legat found Kulscar digging a ditch to change the water course, and he went into his home, grabbed a shot gun, came outside and fired, killing Kulscar.

Yesterday Mrs. Kulscar, widow of the murdered man, testified that she saw her husband shot and that she ran to his assistance and lifted up his shoulders as her husband died in her arms. She said that she saw Legat jump up from behind a grape vine and run off with the gun.

"He was shot by Legat and Legat told me that is always what he wanted to have done," Mrs. Kulscar testified. She said that she did not hear her husband or Legat say a thing before the shot was fired.

Joseph Mattis and Joseph Kulscar, youngsters who were on the place when the shooting occurred, testified that they saw Kulscar lying on the ground. Joseph said that he heard a shot fired and ran down and saw his Dad in his mother's arms, and then ran for help.

Steve Rago, Springfield township farmer and neighbor, said that he heard the shot fired and ran to the Kulscar place. He said that he placed Kulscar on his truck and drove him to Springtown, not knowing that the man was dead at the time.

"I'm glad I kill him, I have no more trouble with the water, is what Legat told me when I arrested him," testified Officer Joseph Beltch, of the Hellertown police. "Legat told Constable Maynard Barron and I that he had warned Kulscar to keep off his property where the water was. He told us they had been fighting for twelve years about the water rights. Legat told me that he had intended to give himself up after the shooting. He offered no resistance when we took him into custody in his home after the shooting.

Justice of the Peace Levi Stever, of Springtown, testified that Legat said to him in his office the night of the shooting, "I kill him, no more fight, I finish now." He said the two men had been before him many times concerning the water course that separated their properties. Justice Stever said that he does not think that Legat realized what the consequences might be in the action he took.

State Trooper Lawrence Priar, of the Doylestown sub-station of State Police read Legat's statement made to him in the Bucks County Prison after the shooting.

In the statement, Legat told the officers that he wanted Kulscar to keep away from his water supply.

"Yes, I shot gun at Kulscar and pointed the gun at him, 'cause I warned him to get off," one paragraph of the statement read. "I went down to the cornfield and wanted to see if Kulscar had died or not. I was 20 feet away from him when I shot. I didn't want to kill him, I just wanted to chase him out," Legat told the officers in the statement.

WITNESS SAYS WAITERS ON BOAT WERE DRUNK

ONE TAKEN FROM ROOM

By James J. Kilgallen
(I. N. S. Staff Correspondent)

NEW YORK CITY, Sept. 12—"Quite a few" of the waiters on the Morro Castle were intoxicated when the liner left Havana on its ill-fated voyage to New York, it was testified today at the Federal inquiry into the cause of the disaster, by Miss Katherine Liebler, Bellrose, Long Island, a passenger.

A murmer of astonishment passed over the court room when this assertion was made. Miss Liebler is 27 years old, of medium height and slim. She testified in a calm, clear voice. "After the ship left Havana quite a few of the waiters were intoxicated; one had to be taken from the dining room."

Frankly fearful that some of the key witnesses in the Morro Castle disaster may disappear before they have a chance to tell their version of what took place, Federal authorities probing the disaster today had under subpoena every member of the crew who survived the disaster.

Already one youthful survivor is detained as a material witness. In his case, however, the detention is described merely as a "protective measure," made necessary by the extraordinary importance of his testimony.

He is George I. Alagna, radio man aboard the doomed vessel.

The decision to issue the subpoenas came after Department of Justice agents had learned that some of the crew members had been signed by the Ward Line, owners of the Morro Castle, to ship for Cuba on other vessels.

Meanwhile the probing board headed by Dickerson W. Hoover, was to hear further witnesses today either affirm or deny stories of disgraceful cowardice on the part of the crew in frantically seizing lifeboats and leaving passengers at the mercy of the flames or the rain-swept seas.

In the wake of Chief Engineer Eben S. Abbott's testimony that he fled the ship in a boat containing 32 crew members and only two passengers, Dr. D. A. Carben was today expected to give his own version of this extraordinary episode. The physician was one of the two passengers mentioned in Abbott's testimony. The other was a woman, but there was no indication as yet as to her identity.

With the Commerce Department inquiry scheduled to run for three more days, there was every indication today that a great mass of sensational testimony on the panic of passengers; the trapping of victims in blazing state rooms and the behavior of officer and crew is still to be heard.

JAPANESE TROOPS IN CHINA ARE STILL ON WAR FOOTING; ARMY WORKS HARDER THAN ANY OTHER IN WORLD, WITH DRILLS, ROUTINE THROUGHOUT DAY

USE AMERICAN TRUCKS

Lower Ranks Are Rarely Permitted to Wander About City at Liberty

By John Goette
(I. N. S. Staff Correspondent)

CHINCHOW, Sept. 12—(INS)—The Japanese army without doubt works harder than any other in the world. From dawn until dusk there are drills, practice skirmishes and barrack routine. The men do not get the entire afternoons off for free and unrestricted liberty as do the men of the U. S. Army or Marine Corps on duty in foreign parts.

The Imperial Japanese Army in Manchukuo is on a war footing, I was told by the staff of Lieut. General Sugiwara, commander of the 7th Division which garrisons Jehol province. This means day and night sentry and patrol duty and the constant dashing about of trucks and motorcycles.

It has been said with full truth, that the Japanese occupied southern Manchukuo with American trucks. Scores of these made the quick dash and bloodless investment of Chengteh possible. I counted thirty-five American trucks lined up in front of a Chengteh headquarters ready to carry supplies to the outlying garrisons.

Wives of officers are not permitted to join them on this war service, and the number of Japanese women in southern Manchukuo is decidedly limited. However, there are four or five in each of the 18 modern style cafes which I counted on the main streets of Chengteh.

These cafes, some of which have English names for some unaccountable reason, are done in the Japanese manner so as to give the soldiers a touch of home. They are nothing more than beer halls with rickety gramophones. Dancing is still impossible due to the yet unconverted Chinese brick floors.

Sake, the native Japanese wine, and Japanese made beer are the beverages sold. Officers and foreigners like myself have to pay eighty cents silver for a large bottle of warm beer. However, for the privates the government sends beer in to sell at twenty-three cents.

Rarely are the lower ranks of the Japanese army permitted to wander about the city on liberty. Small

FINDS GREAT PROGRESS IN PARTS OF RUSSIA

New Hope Traveler Sees Advance in Some Things in Soviet Country

BUT FAR FROM UTOPIA

NEW HOPE, Sept. 12 — Harry Franck, traveler and writer, who recently returned from a trip to the Black Sea and Baltic Sea has some interesting reminiscenses of his journey in the land where the Soviet Union holds sway.

Mr. Franck landed at Bremen and crossed Germany just after the widespread executions ordered by Hitler. He experienced no difficulty in any way, however, and crossed into Russia.

From Moskova he took the best available railroad express to the south, making frequent stops at important centers. He covered about 4,000 miles by this method of travel, at a speed not exceeding 21 miles an hour, and his ticket called for sleeping privilege on a plank. From Tiflis through the Georgian Mountains by auto he came to the foot of Mt. Arrarat, which is just over the border in Turkey.

On a small steamer on the Black Sea the New Hope man forgot the motley crowd of passengers in enjoyment of the beautiful scenery skirting the Crimean region past Sevastopol, famous in history because of the siege of 1855. Along the northern coast are numerous attractive Summer resorts and the Russians do not concern themselves about styles of bathing attire as both sexes have discarded them as unnecessary. While in this section Mr. Franck saw Stalin but did not attempt to interview him.

Along the Dneiper River he inspected the hydro-electric plant at Dneiperjes, the greatst project of its sort in the world, with electricity sufficient to supply a large part of the country when it shall be needed. Cities that he found making striking progress in municipal improvements were Khartof, Kief and Odessa, and of course, Leningrad.

He was interested to note the persisting custom of a small percentage of the people to hold religious services in Greek Orthodox asemblages. While about 90 per cent. of the priests have been either killed or forced into trades, the remaining ones are making an heroic stand. The industrial system sets aside one day in six for rest and only occasionally does this fall coincident with the Sabbath. Mr. Frank attended some of these religious gatherings.

While not endorsing Soviet principles, Mr. Franck claims the nation has some remarkable achievements to its credit. The Soviet republic is not nearly the Utopia its propagandists would have us believe; neither is it so immoral and radical as its detractors insist. This was one of the few countries that Mr. Franck had never previously visited, and he found his time there filled with interest and his travels unmarked by danger. In fact, he said, he felt safer there than in the average American city.

MAKES SUICIDE ATTEMPT

New York City, Sept. 12—Penniless and disheartened by a long series of "bad breaks," Charles A. Levine, famous as the first trans-Atlantic airplane passenger who flew with Clarence Chamberlain from New York to Germany in 1921, attempted to commit suicide in the apartment of a friend in Brooklyn early today. Levine, stopping at the home of A. J. Walters, shortly before 4 a. m., went into the kitchen, wrote three notes, one of which was to his mother and another to his host, then turned on all six jets in the gas range. Walters who previously had heard Levine get out of bed, smelled the fumes and ran into the kitchen and turned off the gas. A pulmotor crew was summoned immediately and Levine was pronounced out of danger by physicians at 6 a. m.

FIFTH SESSION FOR PINCHOT

Harrisburg, Sept. 12 — The special session of the legislature which convened at noon today, was the fifth called by Governor Pinchot during his two terms in office and his fourth during this administration. Only one other Governor in the state's history convened the legislature four times in one term. He was Thomas Mifflin, who was Governor for six years during the 1790's. Including the present session, there have been 17 extraordinary convocations of the legislature since Pennsylvania became a Commonwealth.

WOMAN KILLED AND FOUR PERSONS ARE INJURED WHEN THREE MACHINES CRASH ON HIGHWAY AT PARKLAND

Mrs. Sarah Becker, 42, Philadelphia, is Victim of The Accident

ONE CAR OVERTURNS

One Driver Claims Machine Crashed Into Rear of His Car

PARKLAND, Sept. 12—A woman was killed and four persons injured, two seriously, late yesterday afternoon in an automobile accident at Parkland. Three machines crashed on the Lincoln Highway and one of the cars dropped down an eight-foot embankment and overturned.

Dead:

Mrs. Sarah Becker, 42, 2655 Sterner street, Philadelphia. She was pronounced dead of a fractured skull on arrival at the Mercer Hospital, Trenton, N. J.

Mrs. Becker's daughter, Ruth, 21 years old, is in the same hospital suffering from severe lacerations of the face and leg and from shock.

Samuel Becker, 47 years old, driver of the car in which the Beckers and Robert A. Polaway, 13 years old, of Baltimore, a nephew of the Philadelphia couple, were riding, suffered lacerations of the face and contusions of the eyes, and he, too, is receiving hospital treatment.

The Polaway boy received deep lacerations of the left arm and body, and is suffering also from shock. He is being held under observation at Mercer Hospital.

Mrs. Minnie Cohen, of Philadelphia, suffered bruises of the neck and a possible fracture of the left leg. She was treated at the office of Dr. Henry Lovett at Langhorne.

According to Patrolman Carfagno, of the Langhorne Highway Patrol, Becker driving south on the highway, applied the brakes of his car to avoid hitting a truck operated by Hamilton F. Brunner, of Baltimore, which was traveling in the same direction. Becker's machine ran off the road, crashed into two guard posts and dropped down an embankment.

An ambulance of the Overlook Hospital, Summit, N. J., which was passing, rushed Mrs. Becker, her daughter, and the Polaway boy to the hospital. Becker was taken to Trenton by a passing motorist.

Reuben Cohen, of Philadelphi,a was driving ahead of the truck and, he claims, the machine crashed into the rear of his car. Cohen, who escaped injury, had his wife removed to Dr. Lovett's office.

Leaders Feel Confident Legislature Will End in Week

HARRISBURG, Sept. 12—Confident predictions by Republican leaders of the adjournment by next week-end, today ushered in the Commonwealth's fourth special session of the Legislature called in as many years by Governor Gifford Pinchot to deal with relief problems.

Republican legislators were committed by party leaders to support the party program of raising $20,000,000 for relief by borrowing and transfer from the motor and other state funds.

Democratic legislators at their caucus last night demanded the funds be raised by utilization of unencumbered state funds and a tax on incomes of public utility corporations.

In a statement issued at the conclusion of the caucus, David L. Lawrence, Democratic state leader, declared: "The Democratic members of the Legislature unanimously decided this Legislature should meet the problems by direct action and not attempt to postpone it until the next session which must deal with its own problems of raising probably over $50,000,000 for unemployment relief in Pennsylvania in 1935, in addition to providing for a huge deficit for the present biennium."

The Democratic caucus also voted to support a state recovery act patterned after the N. R. A.; liberalization of old age pensions; eligibility requirements; and ouster proceedings against Representative Joseph G. Steedle of Allegheny, convicted of election law conspiracy, and State Senator John J. McClure and Eugene F. White, chief clerk in the House. The latter two were convicted in the sensational Delaware County conspiracy case.

CHILDREN AND SAFETY

With children marching to school again, one can not contemplate them without wondering how many of them will have met death under the wheels of a motor vehicle before the schools end next June.

It can be predicted with almost certainty that some will have died in this way and that others will have received injuries which will cripple them for the rest of their lives. Sufficient basis for the prediction is to be found in the record of past years. It seems impossible to prevent accidents involving school children as the victims.

Police vigilance is increased with the opening of schools. School teachers impress upon their charges the vital importance of this hazardous undertaking. Parents caution their children against taking chances and urge upon them the necessity of watching for cars before stepping into the street in order to avoid being run down. The motoring public is appealed to to be more careful than ordinarily, and, as a reminder, signs are painted in the streets in the vicinity of school buildings.

Yet, despite all of these precautions, fatal accidents occur. How to prevent them is a problem that seems impossible of solution. Children forget or carelessly ignore the safety instructions given them, and periods of recklessness seize motorists and truck drivers.

The greatest responsibility for the safty of children rests upon those who operate motor vehicles. Children, especially the younger ones many of whom for the first time are venturing into the streets alone, can not be expected to exercise the sense of care as would an older person more experienced in the dangers of the streets. If motorists would keep constantly in mind the need of exercising extraordinary care and would do this, the lives of many children would be saved. Automobile clubs are doing important work in trying to further safety education.

Continuance of their efforts and maintenance of other precautions already in operation give hope that this year's fatality lists will be sharply reduced. Every possible precaution must be taken to see that the children are protected.

This task is one in the performance of which every individual should feel that he has a duty. Lives are at stake.

Some days your work seems so rotten that you would just give up and quit if everything else didn't seem rotten.

"CAROLINE" by RUTH DEWEY GROVES

CHAPTER XXX

Malcolm looked at her in an astonishment that brought a smile to her pale lips—she had forgotten to rouge them.

"You are thinking that I might not be on Edge Street, this winter, aren't you?" she asked him.

"Will you?" he returned, covering his eagerness for her answer with a steely composure.

"I'm afraid so," she admitted. "You see, Malcolm—that is what I want to tell you. I haven't found my happiness completely, as you thought. There's an obstacle to it. I must wait until it has been removed. You may be shocked—I am sure you will be. That is why I wanted to tell you myself. The man I love is married."

Malcolm found nothing to say to her. His thoughts were suddenly chaotic. He could not speak, he felt, without blundering.

"I see—you are shocked," she said regretfully. "But don't judge me hastily, Malcolm. There are things about it . . . well, extenuating circumstances, that make it less shocking than it seems. His wife has no right to him, really. She married him knowing that he did not love her—that he . . . loved me. If she had refused him he'd have come back to me—surely she knew that!—but she took him because he had something her father's money could not buy for her—a place in society." She paused. Malcolm waited.

"You see what she is!" she cried defiantly. "A silly little fool! She sold us out—Howard and me and herself too—in a cheap bargain. She hasn't got what she wanted, and we've had to suffer. It isn't fair!"

"Yes. I was engaged to him, Malcolm, when father lost his money. We quarreled over our future and he went away. When he came back he was so blue and lonely he didn't care what he did."

Malcolm's mind flashed back to that sultry summer day at the factory, when he had told her of Howard's marriage. He was certain now that he had dealt her a terribly unexpected blow. Anger toward any man who could make her suffer rose sharply within him.

"And you've forgiven him!" he said accusingly.

"You don't understand," Caroline answered gently. "He did not marry to make me unhappy—there is nothing for me to forgive, on his part. And I shan't forgive Gwendolyn Hoffmann. I'm taking him back."

"Didn't she keep to the bargain, whatever it was?"

"It was broken when they made it because it was a lie and she knew it—she made him think she would fill his life so completely that he would forget me." Caroline was quite unconscious of any egoism in the remark, thinking only of Gwendolyn's self interest.

"But you said she didn't get what she wanted, either," Malcolm reminded her.

"She wanted to be a society leader, and people wouldn't have her," Caroline explained. "And now that they both know it was a great mistake they . . . he . . . is giving it up. Don't you think I've a right to him, Malcolm?"

Malcolm answered slowly, deliberately: "There are a lot of things we all have a right to," he said, "that would give us the jitters if we got 'em. I hope you'll be happy, Caroline, but if you are—with Howard Dunsworth—I'll know I've been a darn fool about you."

Caroline was startled, puzzled, and a little angered by what Malcolm had said. "You hope I'll be happy, and if I am you'll hate me!" she exclaimed. "Well, that looks as if you have . . . sort of fallen for me against your better judgment."

"I thought you were the finest girl in the world," Malcolm answered unhesitatingly. "But if you can care for that guy you just aren't as fine as I thought, that's all."

"Aren't you being too severe on Howard?" Caroline asked. "You know you're hurting me, but I can't blame you if you have a wrong impression of him. What is so bad about him?"

"I just don't like him. I've seen him and I don't like him and his reasons for marrying another girl sound funny to me. Why didn't he come and ask you to marry him?"

For a moment Caroline, staring at him, thought that perhaps she had been mistaken in him, that he was as crude as his background. Then she saw that his face was white, his lips stiff with pain. He couldn't appreciate fully what he was sacrificing. She forgave him.

"If only I could make you understand," she wailed helplessly. "It was my fault that Howard didn't come back to me. I was terribly unreasonable with him. And then he only married Gwendolyn because he thought he could make her happy. If you say any more against him I'll think you just have middle class prejudices, and you haven't seemed to be that kind of person at all."

"What does it matter what I think?" Malcolm said, flushing.

"It matters to me. You know it does. No one in the world has been such a true friend to me as you, Malcolm. Don't let's end it in a quarrel. I'm sorry I said that about—prejudices. You aren't a sophisticated person, and I've been glad you aren't. But this isn't an ordinary, sordid triangle, Malcolm. Howard belongs to me. Gwendolyn is the thief. And if he isn't all that you admire in a man he is still the man I love. I can't believe he could hold me like this if he were as worthless as you think."

"I apologize," Malcolm said miserably. "I think Dunsworth is a loafing snob, but if you love him that puts wings on him."

"Thanks," Caroline said gratefully. "You gave me a bad moment, Malcolm."

"I'm sorry. And I guess nothing could really change my opinion about you, Caroline. But I'm bound to hate the man that get's you. You might have expected that."

"I only wanted you to know the truth," she told him.

Malcolm was glad, in the weeks that followed, that he did know it. People in the neighborhood began to gossip. He could see that his mother was worried for Caroline's sake. But he never discussed her affairs. Somehow Howard's name had leaked out and the code of Edge Street said that a married man should not keep company with a single girl.

Mrs. Rutledge withdrew again into the reserve she had formerly shown. Some of the women looked askance at her when they met in the market or on the street. Only Mrs. Stuart and Mrs. Barnes defended her and Caroline. The others said society doings might be all very well in society but not among people who had something to do besides getting themselves talked about.

Caroline was impervious to the sly glances that were cast at her. She was living in a world of her own—a world wherein her object was to build up and maintain her faith in Howard, to trust him in spite of the doubts that frequently assailed her. For Howard gave her no indication of any progress made toward his freedom.

One day, following a night when her father had attempted with bitter, caustic argument, to make her admit that she was playing a fool's part where Howard was concerned, she was driven to ask Howard a direct question about a point her father had brought up and she had been unable to answer.

"Have you told Gwendolyn?" she asked, "that you want a divorce to marry me?"

This was a question that Howard had anticipated, because he knew that Caroline was no moral weakling. He answered with the lie he'd kept ready.

"Yes, she knows," he said, with a tinge of bitterness, "but it was a mistake to tell her, Caroline. She's jealous of you, and determined to stand in your way."

"But you, Howard!" Caroline cried. "Surely she cannot hold you against your will!"

"If you mean—living there in the cottage," Howard said slowly, "that is only for appearances' sake—to keep Dad out of a hole."

Caroline thought of her own father's ruin—of her mother's sufferings and her own unhappiness—it did not seem just that the man who had helped to bring them to disaster should be protected at further cost to her. Howard, she felt, was putting too much stress on duty, counting material possessions too far above their love.

But she could not say this to him, for suddenly he took her in his arms and kissed her so tenderly and yearningly, pleaded with her so earnestly to be patient, that he succeeded in making her think that she was the selfish one.

"There is nothing between Gwen and me but just the few words we can't avoid," he declared passionately. "We aren't even friendly, Caro. I'd get out in a minute if it weren't that you and I would pay for it. Don't you see, dear, some day I must take you away from this place. I must have money to do that. You know what poverty is—it ought to help you to see that I am right—that I am thinking of you. It was because I loved you so desperately that I lost my head and told Gwen I wanted to marry you—that I am going to marry you. I wanted her to know that you are the only girl I love. It was a mad sort of loyalty to you, Caro darling. You can't let me down because I did that, even though it makes things harder for us."

Caroline, torn between her parents' disapproval, her own misgivings and Howard's pleas, was helpless. But one thing was definitely clear to her—she must return to work. Her mother had had to tell her that their money was gone and they were in debt. Philip had borrowed where, and what little, he could. And Howard had been shown, by the haughty return to him of certain presumptuous gifts which he had brought to the house, that his help would not be accepted.

When she told Howard what she intended to do there was another scene, but she would not be moved to change her mind. Howard agreed at last not to try to thwart her and Caroline was grateful to him. The thought of appealing to Malcolm to find her a place at Purcell's had been repugnant to her. They scarcely ever saw each other. To call him in, perhaps keep alive his hopeless love, only because she needed him and had nothing to give in return was too great an advantage to take of his kindness, she felt.

It had occurred to Howard that factory work might be the very aid he needed. Caroline wouldn't stand up under it for long, he told himself. But if she proved more determined than he thought he could see that her way was roughened a bit. The Rutledges were stubborn in their pride, but he believed there would come a breaking point even for them. Then—a little house somewhere in the country for Philip and Alva—an apartment for Caroline—and Gwen could do as she darned pleased, he assured himself.

One thing he insisted upon—a car of her own for Caroline. He drove it up to the house on the day before she was going back to work and told her that if she did not accept it he would drive it away and never return.

It was a small, inexpensive coupe, and Caroline felt that to refuse it when she needed it so badly would be carrying pride and convention to the point of absurdity. She had planned to use the sedan but she foresaw endless argument with her father on that score. He had said she could go with Malcolm. Caroline had remarked how changed he was since the time he protested against his daughter's riding on a motorcycle and with a factory worker at that.

Mr. Rutledge had retorted that since she'd taken up with Howard Dunsworth anything was good enough for her. Alva had burst into tears and begged them to stop their quarreling. It had been an ugly scene. Caroline dreaded another like it. She told Howard she'd be glad to have the coupe.

He did not explain to her that he had got it for her because he remembered that she'd told him how she'd got to work before. He felt it beneath him to admit jealousy of a nobody like Malcolm Stuart. Besides that, he considered it the first link in the chain that he hoped would eventually bind her to him. Caught himself in the trap of luxuries provided by another he believed that he could possess Caroline in the same way.

DEMOCRACY AT WORK

THE Telephone Industry is Democracy at Work.

Three-quarters of a million men and women in every walk of life—a cross-section of America—have invested savings in securities of Bell System Companies.

A quarter of a million men and women are Bell Telephone employees. Almost 17,000 are Pennsylvanians. They are your fellow citizens, neighbors, friends.

There are 17,000,000 telephones in the United States—practically everybody is a telephone user. In our country are more than half the telephones in the world—six times as many in relation to population as in Europe.

THE company that operates Pennsylvania's Bell telephones is part of a nation-wide telephone democracy. This is the Bell System—an association of twenty-four operating companies, each independent within its own territory yet combined to serve the nation as a whole. With them are affiliated the Bell Telephone Laboratories, home of telephone research and development, and the Western Electric Company which manufactures for the System.

There is no pulling at cross-purposes; no costly overlapping of activities in this democracy of telephone companies. The American Telephone and Telegraph Company co-ordinates their efforts; operates the "long distance" lines that join them together; carries on the many and varied activities that can best be done by a central organization.

PENNSYLVANIA, as a result, enjoys the finest telephone service in the world and we urge its broader and broader use as contributing to the American way of living.

THE BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY OF PENNSYLVANIA

Associated with the Bell System—participating in and benefiting from the telephone research, telephone development and nation-wide telephone experience which have given America the world leadership in telephone service.

PALATABLE SOLUTION OF FOUR VITAMINS FOUND IN TOMATOES

By Rhandena A. Armstrong
Home Economics Representative

A big, tall glass of rich, red tomato juice is a food drink which is becoming more and more popular, because it is so refreshing and tastes so good.

Tomatoes are sometimes referred to as a palatable solution of four vitamins. These are Vitamins A, B, C and G. But vitamin C is our particular concern, because it is one of the necessities of life and good health. It does not stay as other vitamins do, little being stored in the body to be used as needed. Therefore, a continuous supply is needed. This becomes more difficult when fresh fruits and vegetables are out of season, and that is where tomatoes fit into the diet.

Most foods lose more or less of their vitamin C when they are cooked or canned, for this vitamin is usually destroyed by heat, especially heat in the presence of air. Not so with tomatoes for their acidity prevents this for the most part. Proper cooking and canning also aid preserving the vitamin content.

Canned Tomatoes: Select firm, ripe tomatoes, free from spots and decay. Cut in quarters, heat just to boiling, and pack hot in hot jars. Process five minutes in a hot water bath.

Tomato Juice: Select firm, ripe tomatoes; wash and cut into sections. Simmer in small quantities at a time until just soft enough to put through a sieve. Bring to boiling; pour into hot sterilized jars and seal. No processing is necessary.

Be prepared for next winter by canning 15 quarts of tomatoes for each member of your family.

OBSERVE ANNIVERSARY

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Torano, 231 Dorrance street, entertained 20 guests at their home, Monday evening, in honor of their sixth wedding anniversary. Music, dancing and refreshments formed a pleasant evening.

GREELEY, Colo. — (INS) — Grasshoppers, unable to satisfy their hunger in the seared fields of western Nebraska, turned to farm buildings and devoured the paint, according to Sheriff Godfrey Johnson of Kimball county. At first, he said, they attacked only buildings covered with green paint and the hoppers left. Later, they apparently learned that all paint tasted very much alike and returned to strip the buildings, regardless of color.

FORMIDABLLE LINE-UP TO BE SHOWN BY ST. ANN'S

St. Ann's A. A. football team, Bucks County champions of 1933, have again assembled and will present another formidable line-up on the gridiron this season.

This year the "Saints" have been tutored, and will be guided by a new coach in Salvatore "Socks" Seneca, the local lad who proved a sensational star with the Overbrook Jackets and Wentz-Olney teams of Philadelphia. His brilliant performance with the St. Ann's eleven last season added tremendously in clinching the championship title. Seneca's wide football experience will be an added advantage to the team.

Practically every man who saw service in last semester's battles have again applied for their respective positions this season. However, a few players who had formerly played with the "Saints," have been added to the roster. For the past few weeks Seneca has had his cohorts on the field in many vigorous workouts Many new plays and formations have been outlined. Apparently Seneca is well satisfied with the results; the fact that they have greatly impressed and have exhibited in form in such a short time. Seneca has greatly elated the team and is ardently confident of another successful season.

Twenty-six players comprise the Purple and Gold roster this year. Virtually every man is equally available for his respective position. For the center position finds C. Oriola and B. Tunis; guards, J. Spadaccino, A. Niccol, J. Magno and J. Seneca; tackles, H. Kornstedt, F. Seneca, T. Angelo, and F. Whyno; ends, M. Cateline, B. Tulio, J. Esposito, P. Corte, and L. Conti.

In the backfield,, Joseph Missera will handle the plays and assisted by able ball carriers as A. Cateline, P. Bornice, R. Pieo, J. Tershon, T. Tosti, and P. Quici. Also available for the backfield are: A. Nertes, T. DiBlassio, A. Bono, and N. Galleon.

Manager Angelo Niccols and John Rich are endeavoring to set September 23nd as a tentative opening date with either Ambler or the 23rd Ward Democratic Club from Philadelphia as the guests.

All games with the exception of the Doylestown tilt will be played on St. Ann's field. Due to the large crowds that are expected this season, ample seats will be installed to accommodate every customer.

The fans are hereby notified that the St. Ann's team has a drastic schedule this year and many good games are anticipated.

Much credit for the layout of the season's gridiron facilities is due to the athletic committee which consists of: F. Sagolla, M. Giordano, W. Missera, R. Palermo and A. Niccol.

"PETE" CHOMA LEADS BRISTOL A. A. BATSMEN

Page the batting champion of the Lower Bucks County playoff series—Charley "Dutch" Afflerbach. Afflerbach, backstop for the Hulmeville A. A. team led the hitting from the opening game of the series and kept the lead throughout. He finished with an average of .421 with eight hits in nineteen times at bat.

"Vic" Rockhill, shortstopper of the winning aggregation, followed Afflerbach with an even .400 for an average. Vic connected for six bingles in fifteen trips to the plate to make up his average.

The leading Bristol A. A. hitter was "Pete" Choma, the first sacker. Pete was tied with Bruce for third place honors with an average of .367. Both batters made eight safeties in twenty-two swings from the plate. The only other Bristol player to fall into the .300 class was "Jimmy" Massilla who made just the even mark with six hits in twenty times up.

"Pete" Devlin was the leading hurler with three victories and nary a defeat while "Joie" Hettman, Bristol A. A., was the fielding star.

Last night at a meeting of the circuit held in the Hibernian Hall, the championship was conceded to the Hulmeville team and the treasure money divided.

Hulmeville will play the Edgely Braves in a series of three games, the first game being held at Hulmeville Saturday and the second at Edgely on Sunday.

"I knew Kulscar long time. We had water right between our two places. I have a wife and eight children. I was working on the farm all day June 21. When I came in at night I saw Kulscar in the ditch and he had a shovel and had dug out some ground so that I could not get any water. I told Kulscar then to get out and Kulscar said to me, 'Get out or I'll knock your other eye out.' (Legat has one eye). I said I'll get a gun and then you will get out of the water.

"I went in the house and got a gun in the upstairs front room. It was my son's gun. The shells were in another room. I put one shell in the gun and went out to see where Kulscar was. I yelled down to the ditch to see if Kulscar had gone home. Then I shot to the ditch.

"I was standing at the grape vine when I fired the shot. I yelled, 'Did you go home or not, or are you still there, you will go out or will you stay in,' and I got no answer from Kulscar.

"I did not take aim with the gun. It went off in my hand. I don't know whether Kulscar was in the ditch or not.

"I shot because I told him if he didn't get out I'd shoot. I shot the gun off just to make a noise to scare Kulscar and to find out where he was."

Charles Wilhelm, who was born and raised on the Legat place, testified that he knew that Legat and Kulscar had fought over water rights.

William A. Dimmig, tax collector of Springfield township, said that Legat complained to him many times about Kulscar being so mean to him and that he believed the whole affair preyed on Legat's mind.

"I never had any trouble with Legat and his reputation up until this affair was good generally, but they two men were always hostile," Dimmig testified.

Japanese Troops in China Are Still On War Footing

groups of them are seen together, wearing their bayonets on their belts. However, in Chengteh, for instance, the soldiers get their amusement walking about the Palace grounds or fishing in the lake on the two days a week permitted.

In the newly opened Japanese shops, the army buys picture postcards showing groups on the Great Wall or other historic spots waving the Rising Sun flag. Some sets of comic colored cards take off the life of the Nipponese doughboys among the native population. These savour very much of the humor developed in the American army while on duty in France.

Military equipment, especially uniforms, was in contrast as to cleanliness with what I witnessed on the two Japanese divisions during the Shanghai hostilities. In that case, every piece of equipment seemed to be brand new. Here in southern Manchukuo, I frequently saw stained and dirt spotted clothes on the troops. Even the officers had several days' growth of beard in some cases.

Frequently, it was difficult to tell at a glance which are Japanese and which Chinese when the latter are clad in the Japanese style uniform of the native Manchukuo army, gendarmes or street police.

For the Japanese army and the small but growing civilian ppopulation, great quantities of dried fish and pickles, which constitute such a large portion of their diet, are for sale everywhere. This lends an aroma totally foreign to the streets where formerly garlic and steaming noodles predominated.

While the Japanese doughboy eats and likes the adapted American army stew, to which he adds rice, he is not so keen on the native food of Manchukuo. While I was visiting a temple with a Japanese officer, he stopped to chat with workmen at dinner. To them he commented on the good food they were having. Aside to me, he turned up his lip with the remark that the mess was better fit for animals than men.

On the Manchukuo railways for the first and second class passengers, who are mostly Japanese, the dining cars are Japanese in style and menu, the latter being printed in English and Japanese. The dishes listed are the traditional ham and eggs and beefsteak of an American diner, or else Japanese but no Chinese.

While my Japanese military hosts invariably offered me beer and Japanese tea to drink, one colonel produced a small glass of straight whisky at high noon. He drank only tea himself. Cigarettes produced were occasionally Japanese made, but frequently Chinese, for which apologies were offered by the hosts. Unlike China proper, no American smokes were to be bought in southern Manchukuo.

Chengteh with its millions of dollars of imperial treasures disappearing from the decaying palace and temples, was once a fertile field for the purchase of excellent curios. That is changed now, and in the three remaining shops, only the poorest variety is to be found. The dealers told me that the Japanese military are not good customers. They buy only small articles which can easily be shipped back home.

Although there are no motion pictures to amuse the Japanese army in Chengteh as yet, I did find copies of a Japanese motion picture magazine replete with pictures of American beauties in current musical hits.
